Special Assessments

A condominium is a form of community living where residents agree to share various aspects of a property to gain larger benefits. Sometimes, a community has unforeseen expenses, or did not save enough reserve money to cover known future expenses. In this case, the board will often resort to special assessments.

Special assessments are extra charges assessed to owners to cover large expenses. They are becoming more common as many condominium projects in Hawaii contain aging buildings and infrastructure. Corroded aging pipes are commonly a cause of special assessments. Some associations have maintained low maintenance fees which have led to underfunded reserves insufficient to cover repairs.

Payment & Financing

Typically, special assessments are used to cover special expenses that range from natural disaster cleanup and mitigation, unplanned price increases in building repairs, lawsuits, or unexpected structural failures.

A board will typically get several repair quotes and then offer several financing options to the association. Boards generally need association approval via a vote to borrow to pay for the special assessment, which will be reflected in higher maintenance fees for the term of the loan.

Should the association vote against financing, the board will typically levy a one-time special assessment on all units. This option is usually a larger immediate financial burden upon unit owners than the longer loan period.

A board owes a fiduciary duty and thus rarely will do nothing in the event of a need for a special assessment. Any inaction puts the directors and the association at substantial risk of liability and may render the project uninsurable. Property values may also decline.

What Can I Do as an Owner?

Special assessments are legal and an emergency way of financing necessary expenses. Condominium owners can help reduce the need for special assessments by maintaining good management, helping maintain the buildings, and reporting damage or potential risk of damage quickly. It is cheaper to mitigate flaking paint than to replace crumbling concrete.

A good board that maintains transparent, fair, respectful, and equitable governance can reduce the possibility of a lawsuit. Keeping owners aware with publicly posted notices, making sure everyone has a copy of the governing documents, budgets, agendas, and minutes can reduce the chance of a civil action. When owners feel that their concerns are heard and taken care, they are less likely to sue.

Owners can also keep informed about the reserve studies and project's financial statements to help their board determine if maintenance fees are adequate. Over time, the cost of repairs, materials, and labor increases and updating a reserve study and maintenance fees to cover the projected cost increases can help prevent or reduce a special assessment.
